

Mystical Phenomena

Zach Hirsch begins another training session at his South Florida home with Michael Spinks, one of the top light heavyweights to ever step into the ring.

Spinks, who was inducted into the International Boxing Hall of Fame in 1984 with a 31-1 record, is teaching the 18-year-old Instagram influencer the intricacies of the sport he loves, up close and personal.

“I’m fully immersed in the sport of boxing,” says Hirsch, who made his professional debut as ringside reporter and boxing insider in early November for the Impact Network’s IMPACT Championship Boxing series airing Saturday nights.

The immersion includes sparring twice a week with Spinks or BJ Flores, who amassed a 34-4-1 record as a professional boxer, including three major world title challenges. Flores has diversified his game since then, serving as a color commentator for The Impact Network and trainer for YouTube social media sensation Jake Paul, who gained an even bigger audience when he knocked out former NBA guard Nate Robinson as part of a late November celebrity pay-per-view exhibition featuring former champions Mike Tyson and Roy Jones Jr., who fought to a draw.

Tyson, no stranger to side show stunts and uncensored takes, credits the brothers, who have more than 42 million YouTube subscribers combined, and other fellow YouTubers for helping to revitalize the sport.

Beating the Odds

Hirsh, who started picking sports winners at age 10, has a knack for playing the odds. Last year, he correctly picked over 90% of football, basketball and combat sports wagers, buoyed by a run of 21 straight college football winners, including the SEC Championship, the College Semi-Finals and the National Championship Game.

The record helped him secure a gig as the official on-air handicapper for Bare Knuckle Championship, which bills itself as the fastest growing combat sport in the world.

“I’m four for four so far picking for them,” says Hirsch, who grew up around the ring. His father, Scott Hirsch, had a brief fighting career, owned boxing gyms and managed two-time heavyweight champ Shannon Briggs; former heavyweight contender Jameel McCline; and multiple world champion holder Cory Spinks, the son of former World Heavyweight Champion Leon Spinks and nephew of former World Heavyweight and World Light Heavyweight Champion Michael Spinks.

“I’ve been around it my whole life,” says Zach, whose boxing acumen, friendly on-camera demeanor and insightful social media posts won over Steve Marcano, whose production company partnered with The Impact Network to broadcast the championship boxing series.

“Zach personifies the future of what all entertainment is becoming: live events, tied to social media,” Marcano says. “It also helps that he has nearly half a million followers on Instagram.”

The five-year deal between Impact Network and Steven Marcano Holdings Group LLC calls for 36 televised events in 2021, a busy schedule that Hirsch is embracing as he balances work and school.

“The more fights you do the more people will be interested,” says Hirsch, who provides analysis and boxer interviews before and after each match. “It’s a great opportunity for me to get more experience in the field of commentating and maybe eventually get on some huge network.”

The freshman with an academic scholarship at Lynn University in Boca Raton attends classes Monday through Thursday. He flies to Los Angeles on Friday, does the show on Saturday, and is back home on Sunday in time to watch NFL games in the afternoon.

“To me, it’s not really work,” he says. “I had a great debut and I’m looking forward to doing more.”

The Impact Network, which is the largest black-owned, faith-based network airing content in over 93 million homes through major cable and satellite providers, wanted a commentator who could connect on camera with fighters and a growing, younger audience. Hirsch, a Gen Zer, plans to launch a daily fantasy sports site among other brand monetization efforts, hitting the parlay on both fronts.

“Influencer boxing is so up my alley,” he says. “2021 is definitely going to be a big year for me.” Until then, he’s back in the ring training and working on his inside game, skills he can take to the booth.

“I realized how much I can learn and adapt as a boxing commentator,” says Hirsch, who hasn’t ruled out an influencer bout of his own. “I’m really taking this boxing stuff seriously and if an opportunity comes up, I’d love to do an influencer match.” — By Chris Casacchia, California Business Journal.
